Conquering the Matterhorn

Jutting into the sky, this magnificent, jagged mountain has long been a magnet for mountaineers and alpine enthusiasts who gravitate to the challenge of ascending it. An iconic jewel of Switzerland, the Matterhorn rises to 14,692 feet, part of the Pennine Alps, or Valais Alps, along the Italian and Swiss border.

After numerous climbers attempted and failed the difficult ascent to the top from the Italian side and from Zermatt, British climber Edward Whymper, part of a seven-man group, became the first person to summit the peak in 1865. Tragically, four of his fellow climbers died during the descent. In 1871, Lucy Walker, a British mountaineer, became the first woman to ascend the Matterhorn; and American Meta Brevoort became the first woman to traverse the Matterhorn from Zermatt to Breuil in Italy.

Their accomplishments led to a surge in travel to Zermatt during the 19th century, as other climbers and nature lovers came to witness the Matterhorn's incredible beauty. Today, visitors to Zermatt can view bronze markers throughout town that commemorate the achievements of these early, pioneering alpinists.

LEGENDARY RAILWAYS OF THE SWISS ALPS

Remarkable feats of railway engineering have made it possible to travel through Switzerland's lofty mountains. PILATUS RAILWAY, the world's steepest cog railway, climbs and descends the craggy face of Mount Pilatus at a maximum gradient of 48 percent. First opened in 1889 under steam power, then electrified in 1937, it now features state-of-the-art electric cars. The GLACIER EXPRESS line, which debuted in 1930, penetrates the mountain barrier separating the Swiss cantons of Valais and Uri, gliding along a jaw-dropping route of towering bridges and mountain tunnels. The GORNERGRAT BAHN, built in 1898, was the country's first electric cog railway and is the second highest railway in Europe at 10,135 feet. Appreciate these impressive railways as they transport you right into the heart of Switzerland's wondrous landscapes of mountains, streams, glaciers, and gorges!
